The Abolishment of General Walker, a Noted Statistician and Free Trader, Wages Raised and Prices Lowered by the McKinley Bill—Some Figures.

The first full year of the operation of the McKinley law fully explains and all is in absolute vindication of Major McKinley's claim that protection tends to increase wages and to lower prices and of President Harrison's position that reciprocity treaties made effective by general protection tend to open our foreign commerce. First as to wages, General Francis A. Walker of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology whose standing as a statistician is shown by the fact that he was superintendent of the tenth census, has satisfied himself a few days ago, while in this city, working on Federal Reserve statistics, by collecting data from 2,000 establishments, that wages are higher, wages of the good times, than in the hard times.

One of the features of the McKinley law is plan in reason in the duties on the finer grades of cloth goods, and if the Republican predictions and General Walker free traders are right in the way in which they agree we should naturally expect a rise of higher wages in the centers of the woolen industry.

The great woolen manufacturing city in all New England is Fall River, which contains 15 of the 63 mills in the country and is the greatest in Providence. Here is the partial testimony of Bradford Durfee, one of the leading commercial citizens of the country, to the present condition of the cotton industry in Fall River, under the McKinley tariff, as contrasted with the days of low duties:

"The supply of cloths at Fall River and Providence is not allowed to accumulate. The mills are not allowed to accumulate because they have made the 'open-ings' of operatives."

The leaders of the last Democratic House in the country, no prosperity in Fall River under the McKinley tariff, on cotton goods. Cloth is much cheaper. There is a larger demand than ever because the cheaper goods have been introduced by the higher manufacturer, and with a larger market as hand the manufacturer could afford to print on a larger scale which always results in a lower cost of production per unit of product and lower prices for the consumer. The Fall River example is more than a case.

If to the cotton and woolen industries and I also know that if we could see how protection would have driven down our mills. As it is we are constantly building new mills as fast as they can be added to meet the demand as it opens."

Another Fall River manufacturer says:

"There can be but one inference. The people of the country are buying to-day goods. That naturally implies that the whole country is in a better or more satisfactory condition than it has been for, and everybody has suddenly made up his mind to 'break out and have a good time.'"

So much for the direct effect of tariff on the wages of the producer and the cost of the product to the consumer. In view of these effects it is unnecessary to say anything to explain the slight temporary increase of prices that is apparent in several industries until increased production has had time to work in the cheapening the supply so as to restore the old level of prices. Every intelligent farmer knows that he can get higher wages if the good times return.

One of the features of the McKinley law to
